It was a trip I'll never forget.

When my parents found out about the incurable disease of my cousin, no one could find right words to express ~~that~~ our feelings. Mary was turning eight when the nightmare came true. She was almost always laughing and when she rarely cried her eyes were like two small blue lakes, hiding a pure soul.

Some people could find our idea bewildering or even bizarre, but we've decided to let Mary spend her last days far from the city. That would be challenging for all of us to live without any modern conveniences, but the girl would definitely love to be among the nature, not among the grey boxes of flats.

- I'm not sure... - said confused aunt Alice when we suggested such trip. She was a pretty woman who looked great for her age. You could usually see her with a ponytail, staying near to her only child. Those days she was still trying to smile, although it was obvious for everyone that she wasn't fine.

- We don't want to be ignorant to our daughter's wishes... especially now, - her husband tried to persuade Alice as he knew how much Mary liked to be outdoors.

Those words had had a powerful effect on the woman and few days later we were on the road. The girl was happy, walking around, having fun with her parents, trying to hide their sorrow.

Now she's gone, but her smiling face is still in our memory.
